one of her men and confirmed a gift by another man, Richard Noth.⁷ Benedict de Angervill and Emma his wife gave the church of Newton to the same house for the soul of Roger de Milliers.⁸

In the following account some particulars are included which relate to the fee of Gurnai (after Bardolf) in South Wootton, Bedingham and Kimberley, held by the Stutevills. There is, however, no evidence that the Bulmers were feoffees of the Stutevills; rather they appear to have been enfeoffed by one of the family of Miliers.

In Michaelmas term 1194 Benedict de Bedingham came and avowed (advocavit) Nicholas de Stutevill of the church of St. Mary of Bedingham, Norf., the advowson of which Theobald Walter claimed. Nicholas was summoned to Westminster to answer.⁹ In 1197 a partition was made of the land late of Ralph de Aubigny in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, namely of 15 knights' fees, part of which was assigned to Nicholas de Stutevill and Gunnora his wife.¹⁰ See the pedigree in Early Yorks. Charters, i, 461. In 1205 the manors of Kimberley ('Kineburn') and Beddingham late of William de Stutevill were committed to William de Cantilupo,¹¹ and shortly after they were committed to Walter de Cantilupo, father of the said William.¹² On 3 January, 1207, these lands were restored to Nicholas de Stutevill, grandson¹³ of Hugh de Gurnai, whereof Nicholas de Stutevill his father had been disseised by reason of the disseisin of the Normans.¹⁴ The younger Nicholas gave 10,000 marks in 1205 for the inheritance of William de Stutevill his brother.¹⁵ In 1218 Nicholas II obtained seisin of the manor of Brinklow, which Eustace de Stutevill had held by the bail of Nicholas de Stutevill, father of the said Nicholas.¹⁶ In 1219 the land of Liddel which Nicholas de Stutevill had assigned to Eustace son of Robert de Stutevill his brother until his full age, which custody William de Valoignes had held and at his decease devised to Saher earl of Winchester, was committed to the said earl.¹⁷

In 1234-5 a fine of land in Kimberley was levied between Roger Buteaute and Nicholas de Stutevill, to which Hugh de Gurnay put in his claim.¹⁸ In 1239-40 the same Nicholas was demandant in a fine of the advowson of Bedingham church,¹⁹ and in 1241 he put in a claim on the ground that one of the parties of a fine of land in Kimberley was his villein.²⁰

In 1244 the service of 3 fees which John de Bulemer held was assigned to the dower of Isabel countess of Arundel²¹ and, although not recorded, was doubtless assigned to the pourparty of Roger de Mohaut.

In 1265 John de Bulemer was attached to answer Alice de Balesham for taking her goods in the vill of Wootton; he replied that he went to the manor of John de Gurney in South Wootton and because the said John was in the conflict of Evesham against the king he seised that manor into his own hands as against the king's enemy.²² In the ensuing year John de Stutevill had safe conduct in going to the king's court, directed to the sheriffs of Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Rutland and Northamptonshire.²³ He was either executed for rebellion or died before 3 October, when his relict

INTRODUCTION

It is outside the scheme of this work to repeat what has been written already about the house of Warrenne, earls of Surrey. A few notes will suffice to illustrate special features of the descent, distribution, and feudal service of this honor. After the conquest William de Warrenne became lord of the rape of Lewes, in which it is possible that he resigned lands in exchange for certain manors in Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex, which were described in the survey as held or claimed for the exchange of Lewes, or for the castelry of Lewes. These were described in the time of Henry II as the earl of Warenne's 'new land.' Other lands in those counties, which had been held before the conquest mainly by Tocha, were derived from William's brother Frederic, who was slain by Hereward before the rebellion of 1070.¹ These were described in the time of Henry II as the earl of Warenne's 'old land.' The only Domesday fee which was incorporated in the honor of Warenne subsequently to the Domesday survey was that of Roger son of Renard. See n. 22.

The identity of William's first wife, Gundreda, has been the subject of much discussion.² She is called by Orderic and by the compiler of the Chronicle of Hyde the sister of Gherbod,³ a Fleming who was made earl of Chester in 1070, and then, returning to Flanders, where there were civil wars, was taken prisoner shortly afterwards and disappears from English history. Gherbod was advocate of the abbey of St. Bertin at Sithiu (now St. Omer). In one of William de Warenne's charters to Lewes queen Matilda is called the mother of Gundreda,⁴ and it is on the meaning of these words mater uxoris mee that the controversy turns. If another charter has been read correctly, king William calls Gundreda his daughter,⁵ and she is styled his daughter also in the fifteenth-century pedigree of the earls of Warenne in the Lewes chartulary. The words filie mee in king William's charter, as printed, are due to a seventeenth-century interlineation; the original words are now quite illegible, and the sense would be satisfied by filiorum. The charter has been accepted as genuine (see Davis, Regesta, n. 232), but its form is not that of a royal charter. Stapleton's theory that Gundreda was daughter of queen Matilda by a first (and quite unknown) husband is refuted by Chester Waters' citation from a letter of St. Anselm to Henry I (Ep. iv. 84). Another suggestion, that she was the queen's goddaughter, it is difficult to accept. One alternative remains—that she was an adopted daughter. As she was the wife of William de Warenne before Lewes priory was founded (1078), she was probably born about 1055 to 1060, and thus would be of similar age to the children of the Conqueror and Matilda, and may have been brought up with them. Gundreda died at Castleacre, in childbed, on 27 May, 1085, and was buried at Lewes,⁶ where her remains and those of her husband were found in 1845.⁷ Her marble gravestone had been taken, after the destruction of the priory, to the neighbouring church of Isford, and used for a Shirley family tomb, but it was recognised in 1774 and taken to Southover church, close to the priory site. The inscription calls her the offspring of dukes (stirps ducum) and the ornament of her age, a Martha in caring for the wretched and a Mary in piety.⁸ The earl's epitaph, from the Lewes chartulary, is printed in Dugdale's Baronage. William's second wife, whose name is not known, offered at his death roos. to the monks of Ely for prayers for his soul, but they were afraid to take it.⁹ She is not mentioned in the Lewes chartulary, but is called sister of Richard Guet in the Bermondsey Chronicle (1098),¹⁰ and was probably of the family of Gouet or Goet, Norfolk (200 marks) in 1156, and William de Say was similarly pardoned 15s.; in Suffolk Chesney was pardoned 36s. 4d. of the past danegeld.¹⁷ He was sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk from Easter 1157 until Michaelmas 1163. In 1161 he owed in Norfolk £200 of an amercement; since 1157 he had enjoyed a grant of 13 librates of land in Blyborough and 6 solidates of the rent of a sochman in 'Loingeland.'¹⁸ In 1164 he was debtor to the crown for over £319 of the old farm of Norfolk, £150 of increment for 3 years, and he owed 74s. 6d. for a murder fine on Clackclose hundred,¹⁹ in which Marham lies. In 1165 he owed £15 5s. for the army of Wales, William de Wurmegai owing a like amount.²⁰ In the ensuing year he was described as William de Norwich, when his men and those of the abbot of Holme owed 5 marks of a duel fine.²¹ In 1166 William de Chesney of Norwich held of Roger de Keneteswell 1 fee,²² of the honor of St. Edmund 1 fee and of the honor of Clare 1 fee.²³ William de Kaysneto and Albreda his wife gave land to Lewes priory for service at St. James's altar for the soul of John de Puninges; Philip de Kaysneto and Adam de Punings were among the witnesses.²⁴ He and Reginald de Warenne of Wormegay accompanied Henry's daughter Matilda to Saxony in 1167, wherefore Chesney had respite respecting his debts,²⁵ for which Isaac the Jew was answering in the following year. In 1170 Ralph de Camera and Alfwyn de Melliers accounted for 20s. for a disseisin made after an assize in Sussex, but the debt was pardoned to William de Chesney.²⁶ In 1172 he was liquidating his debt of £200 for an amercement under the account of Orford, Suff.²⁷ Two years later the roll recites the balance of his debt and adds: 'but he is dead and Hugh de Creissi has (his) land by the king.'²⁸ In the following year Hugh de Creissi duly appears as tenant of 13 librates of land in Blyborough and as answerable for Chesney's debt,²⁹ of which he was later pardoned the balance still due. That year he was a justice in eyre in many counties. For some account of him and his descendants see Giffard, n. 45.

It appears that William de Chesney left three daughters, as stated by the Chronicle of Sibton, but at least two of them left issue. Margaret (Margery) had issue by Hugh de Creissi a son Roger; Clemency seems to have married a Gurnay, and then Jordan de Saukevill; Sarra married Richard Engayne, son of Richard (?) Engayne by Margaret his wife, daughter of Richard Fitz-Urse and in 1185 wife of Geoffrey le Breton.³⁰ Margaret had the lands of this fee in Norfolk and Sarra had those of the honor of Boulogne (?) in Essex and other estates. This appears from a claim by Vital Engayne, son of the above Richard and Sarra, to a third part of 2 carucates of land in Blythborough and Walberswick held by Margaret de Cressy, one of the three daughters and coheirs of William de Chesney. The defendant said that Sarra had released all claim to her father's land in the presence of Henry II, whose notification she produced, stating that Sarra had agreed with Hugh de Cressy and Margery his wife to accept Colum and Serdesley as her share of the father's lands and to release her claim to the rest. Should either of the sisters die without issue, the other's claim to the the said Ascelina.⁵ In 1209 Walter son of William de Grantcurt proffered a goshawk for exemption from serving on any assize save between barons.⁶ Walter de Grantcurt, knt., notified to Pandulf bishop of Norwich (1218-1226) that he renounced all claim to the church of Croxton, having been assured that it was appurtenant to the church of Fulmodeston.⁷ William de Grantcurt in 1239 confirmed to Castleacre the gifts made by his predecessors.⁸

At some period in the 12th century it appears that the dependant tenure of the Burnhams under the Grantcurts was reversed, and the Burnhams became immediate tenants of the earls of Warenne.

In the time of king Stephen, Walter son of Philip, ancestor of Philip de Burnham (living 1199), presented to the church of Burnham Thorpe.⁹ In 1166 Walter de Burnham and his fellows accounted for 1 mark of the pleas of earl Geoffrey and Richard de Luci.¹⁰ Philip de Burnham married Emma daughter and coheir of Ralph L'Estrange of Ercall, Salop, who died 1193-4. There was a plea of land in 1198 between Emma L'Estrange, by her husband Philip de Burnham, against Fulk de Oirri;¹¹ and in the following year Philip and the monks of Lewes had a plea touching a duel.¹² In this year (1199) also a partition of the inheritance was made, before Hubert archbishop of Canterbury, between Philip and Fulk de Oirri, who had married Matilda, Emma's elder sister and coheir.¹³ Emma's pourparty was in Sturmer, Essex, and next year Philip gave 20 marks to have seisin of his land at Felsted, Essex, of which the king had caused him to be disseised.¹⁴ This may have been Grantcurt's alias Gronker's manor in Felsted. In 1200 also Philip and Emma had a plea with John L'Estrange touching land in Childs Ercall, Salop, of which Hamon, John's uncle, was alleged to have died seised; this plea was postponed until Emma's sister should come to answer with Emma.¹⁵ In 1201 the archbishop of Canterbury resigned to Philip de Burnham the wardship of the land and heir of William de Feldstede, saving to the abbess of Caen her right.¹⁶

In 1213 Philip de Burnham was one of three commissioners in Norfolk to inquire about the losses incurred in the recent disturbances by the clergy and Robert Fitz-Walter.¹⁷ At this time he and John the Chamberlain held of William de Heliun 1 fee in Sturmer, Essex.¹⁸ They still held it in 1214-15.¹⁹ Philip died before 1226, when the sheriff of Norfolk was directed to make personal inquiry at Burnham by liege men of the vicinage as to the liberties that Philip de Burnham, father of Ralph de Burnham his heir, and William le Valtre had in the land of Burnham, the sea and port of 'Brunnemuth' and the market of Burnham, and of the accepted liberties to give seisin to the said Ralph.²⁰ See Arundel, n. 46. In or before 1240, presumably on the death of Ralph de Burnham, Hugh de Plaiz fined with the earl of Warenne in 200 marks for custody of the land and heir of Philip (sic) de Burnham.²¹ In 1240 the service of those who held 5½ fees in Burnham of the fee of Warenne was assigned to the dower of the countess Matilda.²² In 1242-3 these fees were held as of this tenement :

Hugh de Plaiz, by the heir of Ralph de Burnham, $1\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Burnham Thorpe.

Hugh de Polstede and William de Gimingham $\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Burnham-Sutton.

Cecily the daughter of Philip de Burnham $\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Harpley.

William de Gurney $\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Harpley.

William de Grancurt²³ $1\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Fulmodeston and Croxton and $\frac{1}{4}$ fee in Clipston.

Ralph de Birston $\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Briston.²⁴

In 1261 a fine was levied between William de Grauncurt and William de Calethorp and Cecily his wife (who was daughter and heir of Philip de Burnham the younger), whereby the demandant released to them 1 carucate of land in Harpley.²⁵ In 1271 William de Calethorp had a grant of free warren in Burnham, Harpley, and Hingham, Norf., and Barnham, Suff., and of market and fair at his manor of Burnham.²⁶

In 1275 there is reference on the Hundred rolls to William de Calethorp's fair at the manor of Burnham, Walter de Grancurt's right of free warren at his manor of Fulmodeston, and Ralph son of John de Brunham's suit of his tenants.²⁷ William de Calethorp held 1 fee in the vill of Harpley, with the moiety of that fee which John de Gurney held of him there, of William earl of Warenne.²⁸ The year following Cecily de Calethorp, in claiming the right of patronage of the church of Harpley, gave this pedigree :²⁹

In 1283 William and his wife Cecily with others were charged with trespasses against Ralph Crundel.³⁰ Two years later the same Cecily acknowledged that a messuage in Burnhamthorpe was the right of Ralph Grundel.³¹ In a fine levied in 1286 between Walter de Grancurt and William de Calethorp and Cecily his wife father of Matthew the plaintiff, purchased from Thomas son of Isabel 1 bovate in Bretton, 1 bovate in Clayton and $\frac{1}{2}$ bovate in Thurstanland; on Matthew's decease Henry de Sellay had had the wardship of Matthew son and heir of the said Matthew with his land.²

The elder Matthew de Shepley was steward of William earl of Warenne in 1219, when the earl was impleaded by Ralph de Eccleshale of having disseised him of his free tenement in Dalton.³ The records show that this fee was held by many tenants in small holdings.

In 1242-3 one knight's fee was held in Walton ('Walfon'), Shelley, Shepley, Dalton, Quarmby, Bretton, Thurstanland and Cumberworth of the earl of Warenne's fee.⁴ Of these tenements the family of Burgh held $\frac{1}{3}$ fee in Walton and $\frac{1}{2}$ fee in Shepley. It is by no means improbable that Adam Fitz-Swain was tenant of the earls of Warenne of all these tenements. In 1284-5 John de Morthen and Peter de Rodes held the vill of Morthen, par. of Rotherham, of John earl Warenne for $\frac{1}{2}$ fee.⁵ It would be possible to show that several other knights' fees were held of the earls of Warenne in the 13th century in other villis in Yorkshire than those already named; but the account would occupy much space. The surrenders made by John de Warenne, earl of Surrey, to Edward II of the castles of Lewes, Conisbrough, Sandal, and practically the whole of his fee, are enrolled on the Close Roll under date 17 June, 1326.⁶

The extent of the Warenne fee in Yorkshire made in 1327 records that the castles of Sandal and Conisbrough, with the towns, manors and lands pertaining to them, were held in chief for 2 fees, and the manors of Hatfield, Thorne and Fishlake by the service of 1 fee.⁷

XXXIX.

In Oxfordshire in 1086 William de Warenne held in Mapledurham 7 hides.

Tithes of Mapledurham were given to Lewes priory some time after 1121. Some account of the early members of this Norman family of Gournai-sur-Epte, in the Pais de Bray, on the confines of Normandy and France, will be found in the publications of the Bedfordshire Historical Record Society (vol. iii. 153-7). The reader is also referred to D. Gurney's House of Gournay. Much of the property which the family held in England seems to have been bestowed by the crown in order to secure the fidelity of a family whose service was important to the security of Normandy. Mapledurham was doubtless the maritagium of Edith sister of William second earl of Warenne, who married Gerard elder son of Hugh de Gurnay I (Hugh III in Normandy) by his wife Basilia, daughter of Gerard Flaitel,¹ which Hugh held at the Domesday survey the three Essex manors of Liston, Ardleigh and Fordham, none of which descended in his line. He became a monk at Bec. To Basilia and her son Hugh may be assigned the gifts to the abbey of St. Mary of Bec of a moiety of 'Lungoly' (Longueil, Seine-Inf.)² and Le Bois de Girard; to Gerard the gift of 'Lisingham' (Lessingham, Norf.). Gerard and Edith had several children, including Hugh II. Edith married, secondly, Drew de Monceaux, Gerard having died in the Crusades.^{2a}

From Stephen, Hugh de Gurnay II (IV) obtained a grant of the important crown manor of Wendover, Bucks. In 1155 and until 1156 Hugh de Gurnay's manors of Wendover and Houghton Regis, Beds., were in the king's hands at a yearly farm of £60;³ the king then granted Wendover away. In 1165 the sheriff of Norfolk accounted for 10 marks from the land of Hugh de Gurnay.⁴ At Midsummer 1173 the king by writ 'de ultra mare' granted to Hugh de Gurnay the younger lands in Houghton Regis and in Norfolk and Suffolk to the value of £50 per annum.⁵ This grant continued but 3 months, for the rolls of the three ensuing years show that Hugh's serjeants had carried away the stock and implements of husbandry from Wickham and the king's part of the manor of Hintlesham, Suff., and the sheriff of Buckingham had received for the king the farm of Bledlow.⁶ This manor was the king's escheat until Easter 1182, when Henry gave it to Geoffrey his son and chancellor. As a result of the loss to Hugh of this manor king Richard in 1197 confirmed to St. Mary's, Bec, an exchange made to them by Hugh de Gurnay of rent and tithe in his Norman lands for land previously given in his manor of Bledlow.⁷ Hugh II married (1) Beatrix de Vermandois and (2) Milicent de Couci. Hugh and Milicent founded a nunnery at Gaille-Fontaine, Pais de Brai, approved by Hugh archbishop of Rouen (who died in 1164), and removed it to Clair-Ruissel soon afterwards, as appears by their charter and the confirmation of archbishop Rotrou (1164-83). To this house they gave the church of Mapledurham, Oxon., and 2½ marks of silver yearly from Caister, Norf., with the assent of their sons Gerard and Hugh.^{7a} They also gave the church of Kimberley in Norfolk.^{7b} Hugh II is said to have died in the Holy Land, and was succeeded by his son Hugh.

In 1179 Hugh de Gurnay III (V) gave £100 for a fine for relief of his land, and 40 marks and a destrier for a loan made to his father.⁸ A return, made apparently by the Great Inquest of Service in Buckinghamshire in 1212, states that king Stephen gave the manor of Wendover to Hugh de Gurnay, father of Hugh, who held it during Stephen's life; that Henry II, after his coronation, allowed Hugh to hold the manor without payment (sine dono); that upon Henry's return from Toulouse he seized the manor into his own hands as his demesne and gave it to another (as described), his grant and the confirmation of king Richard being duly recited; but Hugh de Gurnay (III) shewed (in 1212) a charter of Henry II confirming to Milisent de Gurnay the dower which her husband Hugh (II) had given to her, namely Gaille-Fontaine in Normandy and in England the new land that king Stephen gave to Hugh in augmentation of his inheritance, which Hugh gave to his wife, namely Wendover and Houghton Regis and the land that Edith (Ediva) mother of Hugh had in England,⁹ possibly a reference to Mapledurham. The statement is not consistent in all respects with the evidence of the Pipe rolls.

The younger Hugh's fine and loan remained unpaid until 1186, when it was shewn that the fine of £100 for his English lands had been rendered at the exchequer of Normandy.¹⁰ Richard I at his accession restored Houghton Regis, as 23 librates of land, to Hugh de Gurnay.¹¹ In 1201 Hugh held it as 40 librates,¹² and in 1202 king John restored to him Wendover, saving the year's corn crop to (Felicia) the widow of Ingram de Fienes.¹³ In 1200 the king confirmed to the canons of Bellozanne (near Gournay) the site where the abbey was founded in 1198 by Hugh de Gurnay, with a parcel of the forest of Bray near the abbey, and with churches and lands.¹⁴ Hugh soon afterwards founded the nunnery of St. Aubin.¹⁵ In May 1203 writs were issued for the seizure of Hugh's lands in Normandy and England upon his withdrawal from service to John.¹⁶ Hugh's land in Cantley and Caister, Norf., the land of Hugh de Agée in Norfolk, and all other the lands of Hugh de Gurnay 'our betrayer' in Norfolk and Suffolk, were committed to John Marshal, son of William Marshal, earl of Pembroke.¹⁷ Other land in Norfolk of this fee lay in Swathings, where Hugh de Gurnay II had given a manor to Robert de Burgeinuin, which Hugh son of the donor confirmed to Hugh son of Robert de Burguinuin.¹⁸ A grant by Hugh de Gurnay II and Millesent his wife to his tenant of 5 librates of land in Bledlow was attested by William de Merlo, Oliver de Age, Hodus de Brumustier, Hugh de Burgeinuin, and others.¹⁹ Hugh III is said to have married Juliana de Danmartin, and had issue Gerard, Hugh, and Millesent.^{19a} Millesent daughter of Hugh de Gurnay, married Aumari earl of Gloucester, and upon his decease in 1214 married William de Cantelupe the younger.²⁰ She had land in France and in Petersfield, Hants., and Mapledurham for her dower.²¹

On 13 February, 1206, the king pardoned Hugh the malevolence he bore him for his withdrawal, and directed that his lands should be restored, including Pillarton, Warws.²² In September 1213 the sheriff of York was notified that the king had given Hugh de Gornay the honor of Whorlton and Rudby, Yorks., with the chattels on the demesne.²³ In 1214 he obtained a grant of a yearly fair at Wendover.²⁴ A note of some of his English possessions will be found in Powicke's The Loss of Normandy, pp. 497-8. He died before mid-March 1215; ²⁵ on 9 September previous, in anticipation of his impending death, he prayed the king to take the homage of his eldest son Gerard, which the king did.²⁶

There is no further mention of Gerard, and in 1216 Hugh IV, younger son of Hugh de Gurnay, having succeeded to the inheritance, obtained his fees in Norfolk and Suffolk, which the king's enemies had held of Hugh and were then in the king's hands.²⁷ But if he obtained he did not retain Wendover,²⁸ for it was delivered in August of that year to William de Fienes,²⁹ and in September Hugh's lands in Norfolk and Suffolk were committed to John Marshal until peace should be made between the king and his barons; Hugh's lands in Buckinghamshire and Lincolnshire being committed to another.³⁰

In 1222 Henry III restored to Hugh son of Hugh de Gurnay all his lands in Norfolk and Suffolk,³¹ and in the soc of Waltham, Lincs.³²

In 1233 Hugh de Gurnay had a royal gift of 2 bucks and 10 does from Windsor forest for restocking his park of Mapledurham, Oxon.³³ In 1239 Matilda late wife of Hugh de Gurnay held the manor of Mapledurham in dower.³⁴ It is possible that she subsequently married Roger de Clifford.

Juliana, daughter and heir of Hugh de Gornay, married William Bardolf the younger (n. 2).³⁵ In 1255 Mapledurham of the fee of Gornay had its park, where four years earlier malefactors had hunted; one Nicholas de Mongewell was suspected; he gave to Sir Roger de Clifford, lord of the vill and park, a soar-hawk for having peace.³⁶ Geoffrey de Chausi then held Little Mapledurham of the honor of Wallingford.³⁷ In 1276 William Bardolf had warren here.³⁸

In 1272 John de Chausy was impleaded by William Bardolf the younger and Juliana his wife touching common of pasture of Mapledurham Chauzey, Oxon., of which Hugh de Gurnay, father of Juliana, had been seised, as belonging to his free tenement in Mapledurham Gornay.³⁹ In 1271 the priory of Lewes had 14s. yearly in tithes in this place.⁴⁰

William Bardolf died in 1290 holding inter alia of the inheritance of Juliana de Gurnay, his wife, the manor of Mapledurham, held of the earl of Warenne for 1 fee.⁴¹ In 1304 John Bardolf had a grant of free warren at Mapledurham,⁴² and in 1316 was returned as lord of Mapledurham Gornay.⁴³

In 1341 John Bardolf of Wormegay had licence to grant to John Bardolf of Mapledurham and 3 others 2 of his Norfolk manors for their lives at £150 rent.⁴⁴
